When Species Collide Red Foxes vs Arctic Foxes

When red foxes and Arctic foxes go paw to paw, it's often the more aggressive, more territorial red foxes that win. In 2015, photographer Don Gutoski's award-winning photo showing a red fox dragging around a fresh Arctic fox carcass put the conflict in the spotlight, but research confirms that red foxes have been killing and eating their smaller, paler relatives for a while now.

Arctic and Red Foxes Carnivore Conservation

Hence, arctic and red foxes should compete for the same territories; more precisely the ones in low altitude areas close to the tree-line where prey abundance is relatively high. In the 19th century, arctic foxes bred in all tundra habitats. An analysis of present den use showed that arctic foxes have retreated to higher altitudes as they

red foxes Climate change and arctic foxes

Red foxes have likewise been shown to use pre-existing arctic fox dens, which can lead to den abandonment by the arctic fox (5). However there is no indication of the killing of arctic fox pups (5). The physically dominant red fox can weigh twice as much and be up to 70% longer than the arctic fox (3).

Red Fox vs Arctic Fox The Red Fox

Suitable habitats, such as pre-existing arctic fox dens, have been seen to be taken by red foxes, which causes abandonment for the arctic fox. The red fox is physically dominant to the arctic fox, weighing up to double and being up to 70% longer, allowing them to prey on the arctic fox.

Arctic Fox Red Fox Mammalian Hybrids

The cross, which has been produced in captivity, is reversible, but in most crosses the mother is an arctic fox. Natural hybrids have also been reported (see below). These hybrids are generally intermediate in appearance, but grow faster, and are larger, stronger, and more vicious than either parent.
